P R E F A C E

This is the third volume of the Bibliography of Research on Citizenship, Immigration and Ethnic Groups in Canada. The first volume, published in 1960, covered the period 1920-58, and the second volume, published in 1962, was for the period 1959-61. The purpose of this series is to provide a service to professional research persons who are engaged in research projects of interest to the Department.

The initial date for the material included in the present publication was generally taken as January 1962, the terminal date as July 1964. However, it also includes important relevant works completed prior to 1962 which were not included in the previous compilations and which have been subsequently brought to our attention. #

The bibliography was compiled by Mrs. C. de Hesse of the Economic and Social Research Division with the assistance of Miss F. Gagnon and Miss H. Murka. Entries were selected on the basis of research interest in primary materials; they were initially compiled from questionnaire returns submitted by recipients of the previous compilations, and from publications made available to the Research Division. The major additional sources utilized were the current acquisitions of the Departmental library, the International Index, and Canadiana (a monthly bibliography of the National Library of Canada). Not all the items listed were available for inspection -- in a few instances when bibliographic sources offered only partial data, incomplete citations have been included.

The text is set up to serve as a bilingual document. The sections of the text which would be read by readers of either language (i.e. the preface, table of contents, section headings, and questionnaire) are provided in both languages. Where necessary, the French version follows the English text, and is given the same page numbers with a suffix (F). In the main body, individual references which were originally published in English are given an English description. Those references which were published in French are described in French. Titles of items written in a language other than English or French are given in English and the language of the text is indicated. It was felt that those users who would be referring to such articles in the original language would obviously be conversant with that language. Bilingual sources are designated with a single asterisk. References which have separate English and French editions are marked with a double asterisk.

The basis of subject classification in the main body of the bibliography was described in the first issue and in the 1959-61 supplement, and can be inferred from the table of contents.

This order has been found to have analytical meaning. The European ethnic groups are listed in order of their 1961 census populations for all groups exceeding 100,000. The remainder appear with appropriate headings in the Other European section. Segments of an ethnic group which have formed specific ethnic settlements and which, judging by the amount of research interest shown in them, are of major significance in the understanding of ethnic relations are listed as subsections under the main ethnic section, e.g. Russian, Doukhobor. Although some other order is possible (e.g. by linguistic groups), existing studies tend to be either general (e.g. immigration as a whole) or very specific (for a particular ethnic group) and consequently the present order is most practical. An author index is given in Appendix A. A key to abbreviations used is provided in Appendix B. Appendix C is the questionnaire which can be used for further submissions, although an extra mimeographed version of the questionnaire accompanies all copies distributed, to facilitate such returns.

We wish to thank those who collaborated in this work by providing us with the necessary information. The further development of the bibliography as a contribution to research on immigration and ethnic group relations in Canada requires your continued co-operation. Recipients of this service are asked to complete the attached questionnaire or a note in the format of Appendix C with respect to recent works or projects undertaken by them (nil returns are also useful), or to request persons under their direction who have carried out such projects to do so. Because of the number of inquiries that we receive on such sources, where possible it is also requested that copies of items listed be submitted along with the questionnaire in order to assist in establishing a central repository for research in these fields.

Questionnaire returns and copies of studies should be mailed to the Economic and Social Research Division, Department of Citizenship and Immigration, Ottawa.

Director of Research.

P R É F A C E

C'est le troisième volume de la bibliographie des recherches sur la citoyenneté, l'immigration et les groupes ethniques au Canada. Le premier volume, publié en 1960, englobait la période 1920-58, et le second volume, la période 1959-61. L'objet de cette série bibliographique est de rendre service aux personnes travaillant à des recherches et dont les projets sont d'un intérêt pour le Ministère.

Les dates initiales des travaux incorporés dans la présente publication englobent généralement la période janvier 1962 à juillet 1964. Cependant, elle comprend également des travaux importants et intéressants terminés avant 1962 non inclus dans les compilations précédentes et qui nous furent mentionnés par la suite.

La bibliographie a été compilée par Mme C. de Hesse de la Division de la Recherche économique et sociale avec l'aide de Mlle F. Gagnon et Mlle H. Murka. Les références furent sélectionnées suivant l'intérêt des recherches dans des ouvrages de base; les questionnaires dûment remplis provenant des bénéficiaires de compilations antérieures et les publications mentionnées à la Division de la Recherche furent initialement compilés. Les sources additionnelles utilisées furent les acquisitions courantes de la Bibliothèque du Ministère, "l'International Index", et Canadiana (une bibliographie mensuelle de la Bibliothèque nationale du Canada).

Tous les articles compilés ne purent être vérifiés -- lorsque par exemple les sources bibliographiques n'offraient que des données partielles, des références incomplètes sont incluses.

Le texte a été rédigé de façon à servir de document bilingue. Les sections du texte qui seront lues par des personnes de l'une ou l'autre langue (i.e. la préface, la table des matières, les titres de sections et le questionnaire) sont rédigées dans les deux langues. La traduction française suit le texte anglais, là où cela est nécessaire et elle porte le même numéro de page avec le suffixe (F). Dans la bibliographie même, les références particulières qui furent publiées en Anglais à l'origine ont une description en Anglais. Les références qui furent publiées en Français sont décrites en Français. Les titres de références écrits en une autre langue que l'Anglais ou le Français sont donnés en Anglais et la langue originale du texte est indiquée. On estime que les personnes se référant à de tels articles écrits dans la langue originale connaissent certainement cette langue. Les sources de renseignements bilingues sont désignées d'un seul astérisque. Les références aux publications en Anglais et en Français sont marquées d'un double astérisque.

La base de classification des sujets dans le corps même de la bibliographie a été décrite dans la première édition et dans le supplément de 1959-61 et peut être déduite de la table des matières.

On a trouvé que cet ordre possédait une signification analytique. Les groupes ethniques européens sont classifiés suivant le recensement des populations de 1961 pour tous les groupes de plus de 100,000 personnes. Tous les autres groupes apparaissent sous le titre approprié dans l'autre section européenne. Une partie d'un important groupe ethnique qui a constitué des établissements spécifiques et qui, si on en juge par le grand intérêt qu'on attache aux recherches est essentielle à la bonne compréhension des relations ethniques est classifiée en sous-titre à l'intérieur des grandes divisions ethniques e.g. Russes, Doukhobor. Bien qu'un autre ordre de classification soit possible (e.g. par groupes linguistiques) les études existantes semblent être soit générales (e.g. l'immigration dans son ensemble), soit très spécifiques (d'un groupe ethnique particulier); par conséquent la classification présente nous semble la plus pratique. L'index des auteurs est donné dans l'annexe A. La liste des abréviations employées se trouve dans l'annexe B. L'annexe C est le questionnaire qui peut être utilisé pour des soumissions futures, bien qu'une copie additionnelle mimeographiée du questionnaire se trouve dans toutes les copies distribuées afin de faciliter les retours.

Nous souhaitons remercier ceux qui ont collaboré à ce travail en nous fournissant les informations nécessaires. Le développement futur de la bibliographie comme contribution à la recherche sur l'immigration et les relations entre groupes ethniques au Canada requiert votre continuelle coopération. Les bénéficiaires de ce service sont priés de compléter le questionnaire annexe ou la formule de l'annexe C en indiquant les travaux récents ou les projets entrepris (les envois n'indiquant aucun projet sont aussi utiles) ou de demander à des personnes qui ont travaillé sous leur direction et qui ont entrepris des travaux, de le faire. A cause du nombre de demandes que nous recevons pour ces ouvrages et les facilités grandissantes d'accessibilité au Ministère pour ces publications de recherche, lorsque cela est possible, nous vous demandons que des copies du travail mentionné soient soumises avec le questionnaire afin de participer à l'établissement d'un répertoire central dans ce champs de recherche.

L'envoi des questionnaires et des copies devront être adressé à la Division de la Recherche économique et sociale, Ministère de la citoyenneté et de l'immigration.

Directeur de la Recherche.

"Value Assumptions in Recent Research on Migration".
Sociological Quarterly, Vol. II, no. 4, 1961, p. 281-292.
Comparison of articles written on migration show that earlier sociological writings on migration and mobility tended to be negative in value emphasis, stressing the disorganizing aspects of migration. This negative value orientation has tended to disappear in recent years, being replaced by more neutral attitudes or even positive ones in some cases, such as those implicit in the "push-pull" theory of migration.

"How Migration Affects the Country of Immigration".
Migration, Vol. II, April-June 1962, p. 49-60.

The author analyzes the effect of migration in the country of immigration and in the country of emigration. The circulation of labour not only affects the country of emigration and the country of immigration individually; it also affects them bilaterally -- it affects, that is to say, the entire pattern of relations between the two countries.

"Immigration into Canada, 1851-1920". CJEPS, Vol. XXVII, no. 2, 1961, May, p. 162-175.

Study shows that the record of international migrations into and out of Canada in the 19th and early 20th centuries has been confused by the number of transients who stayed in Canada only a short time before moving on. The official estimates substantially overstate the inflow of true migrants into Canada for most of the decades covered by the study and therefore that emigration figures derived from the official estimates have also been overstated.

This paper attempts to relate in a general way changes in the volume of emigration between Germany, the Netherlands and Australia to changes in economic conditions in these countries between 1959 and 1961. In doing this the author concludes that not many workers from either country were prepared to leave full employment economies to enter a recession economy despite the long-run prospects for higher real incomes.

The differential characteristics of streams of migration are regarded as consequences of social and cultural constraints upon the head of a household. These constraints are expressed in terms of occupation of head of household. Environmental and structural factors will be mediated by the degree of future orientation and the degree of local orientation characterizing various occupations.

This article suggests a typology of migration in terms of the following criteria: 1) whether it is voluntary, forced, accidental or mechanical; 2) whether the migrant intends to establish permanent residence or is transient; 3) whether the migration is by single individuals or is a collective movement; 4) whether the migrant intends to abandon his former residence; 5) whether the movement is through physical space only or also involves social mobility.

After the Second World War the policy of immigration became highly selective and controlled immigration made an important contribution to the economic growth of the receiving countries only when it was introduced (e.g. in Canada, Australia) in conjunction with the continuing processes of economic expansion. Cooperation with international organizations is bound to influence the shaping of migratory movements of the future.

The resultant findings suggest both severe limitations in the generality of the old-new theory as well as the possibility that much of the old-new variance in the U.S.A. reflected differences in the groups' timing of arrival rather than cultural differences.

first one the author criticizes Dalton's position, arriving at the conclusion that Dalton shows
"superficial differences to mask fundamental similarities".
In the second part the author makes a "new approach to economic anthropology".

In the first hypothesis, dealing with the relationship of religiosity and education to ethnic distance, it is found that orthodoxy and extrinsic belief are not related to ethnic distance. In the second hypothesis, examining individual influence of each personality variable on ethnic distance, it is found that anomia, status concern, conservatism, withdrawal tendencies, and anti-social tendencies are not related to ethnic distance.

The general culture fairness of the Davis Eells test is evaluated by comparing performances of two groups of culturally different school children. Davis Eells scores were compared to performances on three other measures: Metropolitan Achievement Test, Sci. Res. Associates Primary Mental Abilities Test, and a vocabulary test of high frequency words. Statistical analysis of the results demonstrated that the mean scores on all measures were significantly different, the Anglo-Americans performing better than their Spanish-American peers in each case. The Davis Eells test failed to give a measure with less difference between groups and was not less culturally biased than the other common measures of intelligence used.

This report is an inquiry into certain relations of selected Anglican down-town churches to their immediate parochial environment, with special reference to sources of membership and income, as well as to areas of service and outreach. The report concludes that sources of membership and income derive largely from up-town areas, and that there is, with some exception, little contact between the churches and their immediate environment.

Study conducted on forty clients of three Ontario family agencies. Fifteen persons were of Anglo-Saxon protestant origin, 15 were of French-Canadian origin and 10 were of Polish-Ukrainian origin. It was found that value differences were not related to ethnicity. Findings indicate the possibility of achieving more objective structuring of interviews if weight is given to the client's value profile as a part of the worker's general diagnostic understanding and differential treatment.

The general problem of occupational discrimination is closely related to the nature of the occupation in which discrimination is practiced. To illustrate some theoretical propositions concerning occupations in which there is relatively little discrimination, the author discusses the integration of Negroes in professional baseball. The theoretical propositions set forth have some rather practical applications with respect to the occupational status of Negroes and other minority group members.

Study of the town of Shefferville in the Province of Quebec, where the labour group comes from North America and Europe. Social relations are poorly

the hierarchical structure being a fairly direct reflection of the salary scale and status within the company.

"Attitudes of Employers Towards the Employment of New Canadians". M.S.W. Thesis, University of Toronto, 1961.
Comparing 52 employers charged and 52 never charged under the Act, the author noted that there was no difference between the groups in the proportion of post-war immigrants hired. Employers in the first group made slightly more comments unfavourable to new Canadians. Employment agencies accepted fewest new Canadians. There seems to be an immigrant's "kind of work" and the under-trained are still exposed to unemployment and exploitation.

"A Study of the Board Members' Concept of the 'Good Citizen'". Unpublished M.S.W. Thesis, McGill University School of Social Work, McGill University, August 1961, 110 p.
The purpose of the study was to discover what attitudes board members of recreation and informal education agencies have toward the concept of "good citizenship" in a democratic nation. Board members sampled tended to stress the traditional concept of the citizen as a person who obeys the laws, respects authority, pays his taxes and votes; the literature stressed the need for a vocal, informed and active citizen. There was little indication that board members see "good citizenship" as entailing active political participation.

"Sociology and Race Relations". Race, Vol. I, no. 1, November 1959, p. 3-14.

The central problem of race relations is social distance, which is the discrimination consisting in the failure to admit strangers to particular relationships, and is characterized chiefly by avoidance. Where social distinctions are more rigid, patterns of social distance also reflect political and psychological influences to a marked extent and it is more difficult to isolate the purely sociological factors.

Ethnic Patterns in American Cities. New York: Free Press of Glencoe, 1963, 230 p.
The residential segregation and assimilation of immigrants and second generation members of ten different groups in each of ten United States cities is examined over a period of over forty years, 1910-1950. There are additional sections based on data going back to the 1840's. The primary emphasis is on the factors influencing residential segregation and on the impact which segregation has for the assimilation studied. A special chapter is devoted to the occupational patterns of immigrants and second generation members. Appendixes of the book give detailed characteristics of each major ethnic group in each of ten specific cities (Boston, Buffalo, Chicago, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Columbus, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, Syracuse). Differences between immigrants and Negroes are considered in terms of their residential patterns and trends through time. Discussion of the assimilation concept and its diverse meanings as well as the relationship between human ecology and race and ethnic relations are also included.

The residential segregation of immigrants in U.S. cities is re-examined for 10 different immigrant groups in each of 10 cities to determine the impact of segregation on other aspects of ethnic assimilation. With one exception, published and unpublished U.S. census reports for 1930 and 1950 are sources for the study. Ability to speak English, citizenship, intermarriage and occupational composition of the immigrant groups in each city are found to be partially a function of these residential patterns and other ecological factors. The dynamic significance of spatial distribution for other dimensions of social behaviour is stressed. That is, the residential segregation of immigrant groups is not only an important element of assimilation, but plays a dynamic rôle in influencing other aspects of immigrant and second generation assimilation.

The relation between conformity and need achievement was studied in 30 male Indian students. The results indicate that the relation is mediated by the instrumental value of conformity, and that when conformity is so perceived, a positive rather than a negative relation will be obtained. The high-achievement group was more sensitive to the instrumental value of conformity than to the congruence of the norms; the opposite was found in the low-achievement group. The groups did not differ in susceptibility to situational pressures.

The study examines attitudes of members of the dominant majority group toward ethnic minorities. Social structure and personality variables are examined. Approval or disapproval of minority rights is found to be a reliable indicator of prejudice. Individuals who are willing to grant minorities greater rights are likely to be less prejudiced. Finally, intergroup contact tends to reduce anti-minority prejudice. Furthermore, if the contact develops into interaction the prejudice is likely to be further reduced.

Each group of migrants is affected by a collective neuroses of anxiety type. That is partly due to migration stresses and partly to a head-to-head collision with another neurotic reaction in the host group called prejudice. Individual migrant "neurotic reaction" may take the form of regression, paranoia, escapism, depression, hypomania, hysteria, or inferiority feelings. These "emotional" disorders in migrants should be treated on a social level, and education is of primary importance.

Certain paranoid reaction types occurring in migrants are due mostly to social factors summarized as "migration stresses". They are purely environmental and have a good prognosis. The patients improve remarkably well when social adjustments and re-education are undertaken. These reactions should therefore not be considered as mental disorders in their real meaning, and patients affected with them should be considered as quickly recoverable potential assets to the community.

"Notes on the Post-Contact Origin of the Midewiwin".
Ethnohistory, Vol. IX, no. 4, Fall 1962, p. 404-423.
The Midewiwin, or "medicine societies" of the Central Algonquian peoples represents a form of religious institution for these peoples. It was long thought to be a survival of the aboriginal (pre-contact) culture. Some writers have suggested that it was in fact a product of the contact situation and represents reaction to the process of acculturation. Hickerson's thesis is that there is no evidence for the aboriginal origins of the Midewiwin, despite the fact that it incorporates aboriginal medical practices; nor for designating it a religious response to deprivations accompanying the acculturation process. Rather, he feels, it is a manifestation of increasing tribal solidarity at the turn of the 18th Century.

 Mr. Ingstad, a Norwegian scholar, whose interest and their activities in the New World. Recently he led an expedition to the northern tip of Newfoundland to carry out archaeological investigations of old house remains at L'Anse au Meadows. He believes, on the basis of the findings and other historical sources, that he has discovered the site of the legendary Vinland.

 "Trade and Tribal Warfare on the St. Lawrence in the

 p. 240-56.
 This article is an attempt to set forth a systematized account of the wars between the Iroquois and Algonkian Indians in the St. Lawrence Valley in the 16th Century. He theorizes that the wars arose out of a competition, not for access to fur production areas but for access to a single market on the lower St. Lawrence River. He points out that white penetration to the Upper St. Lawrence was retarded by Laurentian Iroquois at the site of present-day Quebec in an effort by the latter to monopolize trade. The treatment of Indians by Cartier and Roberval generated enough hostility among the Iroquois on Montreal Island to inhibit French settlement there.

The dissertation is an attempt to define and describe, in ecological and historical perspective, the meaningful socio-cultural diversity of the contemporary Blackfeet reservation community. Various degrees of acculturation are found. Some of the leaders of the Indian-oriented society are highly acculturated.
White-oriented society is composed of some individuals who have turned from Indian to white culture, and others who were never Indian, but were socialized in white ways. They are not acculturated individuals, but must be considered in any assessment of tribal acculturation.

The body of the dissertation contains two parts: (1) changes introduced between 1901 (permanent establishment of the Hudson's Bay Company) and 1955 (establishment of the Radar Base); (2) changes introduced by the Radar Base. In the conclusion, diagnostic factors will be analyzed and compared.

A Comparative Study. University of Alberta (in progress).
The purpose of the research is to determine the area and background.

The research focuses attention on attitudes toward high school, toward further training after high school, toward employment on and off the reservation, the type of occupation desired, attitudes towards the adult in the community, attitudes toward assimilation to non-Indian standards and values held which characterize a shift in orientation toward the urban world. Conclusions reached strongly suggest that Indian students are very much like non-Indian students in their attitudes and value orientations.

- 6-40 "Anomie and Acculturation: A Case Study Among the Ojibwa". M.A. Thesis (Sociology), McMaster University, 1962, app. 125 p.

The thesis applies a revised concept of "anomie" to a concrete situation -- the Indian Reservation situation in Manitoulin Island. An analysis within this framework of the economic rôle of the male Indian reserve-resident demonstrates the conflicting definitions of economic behaviour expected from him and moreover, the inaccessibility to him of means to fulfill an economic rôle.

The thesis presents certain hypotheses as to the reactions to anomie given certain other variables and tries to suggest the utility of the anomie concept for explaining certain social phenomena both within a sociology and anthropology framework. In particular, it places the study of some of the social problems on a modern Indian reservation within a sociological research framework appropriate to any group.

Some attempt is made to assess broadly the impact that trade unionism has had upon the economic and social status and well-being of Indians in this province.

Most of the account deals with unions and strikes in the fishing industry, in which Indians have participated in greater numbers than in any other field. A brief account is also given of their rôle in unions of logging and lumber workers, and of longshoremen.

The material from which this study is taken was gathered in connection with the Stirling County Study, which is being carried out by Cornell University in co-operation with the Nova Scotia Department of Public Health, Acadia University and Dalhousie University. It is the biography of a young Micmac Indian as narrated to the author, who reports it without interpretation, and includes statements made about the informant by other Indians on the Reserve, and an assessment of the material in a separate chapter. It is interesting in that it provides an insight into the mental life of a man who belongs to a relatively highly-aculturated group, who has suffered from a breakdown attributable at least in part to the acculturation situation.

This is a companion volume to two previously published on the material culture and on the social life of the Ingalik, and Athapaskan-speaking groups of the Lower Yukon. Its scope is the beliefs of the people, about themselves, about the birds, animals, the plants around them, about neighboring people, about art and music, and about the spiritual world and human relationship to it. It is a sensitive study in social philosophy which, with the two previous volumes, provide one of the most comprehensive descriptions of any Canadian Indian group.

This article gives a summary of the immigration movements to the U.S. for the period 1946-1959 with a breakdown as to their country of origin. The impact of these immigrants on the U.S. economy is discussed and the idea advanced that more money might be spent to assist some needy immigrants in their country of origin, e.g. Puerto Rico, which would preclude their becoming immigrants. The matter of Cuban refugees in the U.S. is dealt with.

Student respondents were asked to sort statements of a generally misanthropic nature into one of four categories indicating that the statement was in their opinion primarily applicable to Negroes, to Jews, to both, or to neither. A distinctive, mutually exclusive, and highly consensual pattern of Negro and Jewish stereotypes emerged. The generality of stereotyping is displayed in the willingness of respondents to stereotype, and the association between the number of different stereotypes endorsed. The data thus provide evidence for both the generality of stereotyping and the specificity of stereotype assignment.

"Urbanism, Race and Anomia". American Journal of Sociology, Vol. LXVII, May 1962, p. 661-665.

The study, using both white and Negro samples, suggests that for whites, position in the social structure is more closely related to high anomia than is urban residence, although urban residence and low status have an additive effect. For Negroes, however, anomia is high for both small-town residents and lower-class urban Negroes, but high position in the social structure plus urban residence reduces anomia.

Les deux premières parties consistent en une analyse: premièrement, de la tradition culturelle de la Nouvelle-France, et deuxièmement, des traditions culturelles nées après la Conquête de 1760. La troisième partie consiste en une analyse de la conjoncture culturelle actuelle.

A brief retrospective history shows that the survival of French-Canadians as a cultural elite is almost a miracle. However the very structure of this group faces difficulties as a result of sociological and economical revolution. Many reforms must be made in order to overcome the unquestionable intellectual crisis which is affecting French Canada.

L'option politique nécessaire serait un "nouveau fédéralisme binational".

factors influencing the interpersonal attitudes of English and French-speaking Canadians.
The analysis of data was carried out separately for each of five groups: English-speaking Protestants from Windsor and London; English-speaking Roman Catholics from London; English-speaking Roman Catholics from Montreal; French-speaking Roman Catholics from Montreal; and French-speaking Protestants from Montreal.
In every case the variable of belief was found to be far more influential in determining the subjects' interpersonal attitude than was the variable of ethnic group membership.

The four studies that make up this volume were originally published separately in Dutch and now appear together in translation. The findings are based on data collected on 1,000 Dutch emigrants to Australia, Canada, New Zealand, South Africa and U.S.A. in 1955-56.
The first three studies deal with motivations to emigrate;
the fourth examines the circumstances of emigrants overseas. The final section of the book consists of a summing up by the editor who draws attention to the importance of non-economic factors in explaining postwar emigration from Holland.

Student respondents were asked to sort statements of a generally misanthropic nature into one of four categories indicating that the statement was in their opinion primarily applicable to Negroes, to Jews, to both or to neither. A distinctive, mutually exclusive, and highly consensual pattern of Negro and Jewish stereotypes emerges. While the content and assignment of stereotypes is selective, the generality of stereotyping is displayed in the willingness of respondents to stereotype and the association between the number of different stereotypes endorsed. The data thus provide evidence for both the generality of stereotyping and the specificity of stereotype assignment.

Thesis (Sociology), University of Wisconsin, 1962, 163 p.
The assumption that attitudes toward a particular group are highly generalized has been characteristic of most research on anti-Semitism. Examination of the extent to which attitudes towards Jews could be organized along a single dimension was the primary concern of this study. Substantive findings with respect to correlates of attitudes toward Jews were essentially negative.

Personality Characteristics and Political Attitudes of Anti-Communist Hungarian Refugees in Canada.
University of North Caroline Press (in progress).
Study uses a projective psychological technique to explore the non-rationalized attitudes of a group of Hungarian refugees to Communism. Findings suggest that personality characteristics represent important factors in the formation of political attitudes among the citizens of Communist countries. Generally speaking, the extropimitive personality type is more likely than the introprimitive to reject the Communist system overtly and become a political refugee. The refugee is characterized by specific personality factors which distinguish him from his fellow country men under communist domination. These personality factors have a great part in his decision to escape and in the public rôle that he plays in Canada.

- 6-70 GLEITMAN, Henry and GREENBAUM, Joseph T.
"Attitudes and Personality Patterns of Hungarian Refugees". Pub Opin Q, Vol. XXV, no. 3, Fall 1961, p. 351-365.

A questionnaire studied 140 male Hungarian refugees now in the U.S. to determine their attitudes, actions and personality patterns. An attempt was made to discover the inter-relationship, both within and among the following variables:

- (1) major demographic and sociological variables, i.e. age, education, residence and religion;
- (2) revolutionary participation;
- (3) political attitudes.

- 6-71 WIPPER, A.
"Response to Revolution Among Hungarian Canadians: A Study of Organizational Conflict". Reprinted from Berkeley Journal of Sociology, Spring 1961, Vol. VI, no. 1, 24 p.

The emotion-charged intentions of the Hungarian Canadians in support of the Hungarian Revolution were frustrated by their qualities as an ethnic group and not an ethnic colony. Lacking a firm institutional structure and harbouring conflict, the Hungarian Canadians were only initially united by the crisis situation. In seeking to impose organization the Red Cross and other institutions risked the alienation of the Hungarian Canadians. The actual arrival of the refugees provided a new function, and a new channelling of energies and enthusiasms.

For the Greek immigrants the motivations for coming to America and the ties that they have maintained with their homeland have had a greater influence on the social organization of each community than has been true for most other immigrant groups. Sociological, psychological and cultural ties have continued to link them to their homeland and have been influential in the formation and maintenance of various institutions, social divisions, factions, modes of thought, values, and patterns of social interaction.
